Introduction

In the latter 1860s, Jacob Rozier Sr. (Jake), Lucinda Rozier (Lucy), and Jacob Rozier Jr. (Jake) all worked as sharecroppers, cultivating lands along Gum Swamp Creek in what was then designated as northern Pulaski County, Georgia. They were described as “freedmen,” indicating their status as former slaves. Unfortunately, limited documentation on enslaved workers from the early 1800s makes unraveling their life stories difficult.

Given the surname they assumed after the end of chattel slavery, all three undoubtedly had a connection to John Rozar Sr. and his two eldest sons, Seaborn Rozar and John Rozar Jr. These three men, together with Robert Rozar, the eldest son of John Rozar Jr., were the only ones with this surname in Pulaski County, Georgia who owned slaves.

Jacob Rozier Sr. and Lucinda Rozier were contemporaries of Jonas Rozier, the enslaved man born about 1812 who belonged to John Rozar Sr. between 1817 and 1829, and afterwards to his sons, Seaborn and John Rozar Jr. In fact, it appears that Jacob, Lucinda, and Jonas were the three older enslaved people the brothers owned between 1830 and the 1860s. Although concrete proof is lacking, evidence suggests that Jake and Lucy Rozier were a couple and the parents of Angelina Rozier, Esau Rozier, and Jacob Rozier Jr.

Rozar & Regan Family Background

The Rozar and Regan families had multiple connections in Bladen and Robeson Counties, North Carolina between the 1760s and early 1800s. In fact, some claim that John Rozar Sr. (c1763–c1829) was the brother of Mary, wife of Daniel Regan (1765/1770–1827), with both John and Mary the children of Reuben Rozar Sr. [1]. Daniel Regan remained behind in North Carolina when John Rozar left Robeson in 1793. In the early months of 1800, Daniel and his brother, Samuel Regan, moved south along the coast into Beaufort District, South Carolina, where they remained at least through 1803 [2]. About 1805 or 1806, Daniel Regan moved into Georgia [3].

Many families firmly ensconced in Georgia's older counties who drew land in the 1805 and 1807 lotteries had no interest in moving, and they promptly sold their fortunate draws in the lottery to the newcomers, often at considerable profit. On 3 September 1808, Daniel Regan, by then a Laurens County resident, paid $300 to a Washington County man who drew land in the 1807 land lottery. Regan bought Land Lot #92, a 202½-acre tract located in the 22nd District [4]. Following the creation of Pulaski County on 13 December 1808, Regan, now a Pulaski resident, paid $500 to a Tatnall County resident on 5 January 1809 for an adjoining 202½-acre tract, Land Lot #91 [5].

On 20 January 1809, fifteen days after Regan's second purchase, John Rozar paid $400 to a Greene County couple for Land Lot #28 in the 24th District of Wilkinson County [6]. The boundary between Districts 22 and 24 separated Rozar's Lot #28 from Regan's #91, so they lived on adjoining farms, with Gum Swamp Creek, a tributary of the Ocmulgee River, flowing through both of their properties. Between 1809 and 1911, the Rozar and Regan farms lay in the northern portion of Pulaski near its tri-border tip, where Pulaski then intersected Twiggs and Laurens Counties. Rozar's farm lay less than one mile southeast of the Twiggs County border and merely three- or four-miles due west of the Laurens County line. In 1912, this portion of Pulaski County became Bleckley County, where it remains today. The Rozar and Regan farms lay a few miles northeast of the small village of Cochran that developed later in the century [7].

Jacob & Lucinda Rozier

Daniel Regan died in 1827, and appraisers appointed by the Pulaski Court completed an inventory of his estate on 18 October 1827. They listed five slaves among Regan's individual property, including "Jacob a negro man" appraised at $375, "Lucy a woman" valued at $200, and "Angeline a Child" valued at merely $150 [1]. At the sale of his personal property the next month, Seaborn Rozar paid $202 for Lucy, while Jacob was purchased by Regan's son-in-law, James Savage. Angelina was not mentioned in the sale [2].

Savage and his wife soon joined the families of Seaborn's sisters and moved to Alabama. Upon his departure from Pulaski County, Savage presumably sold Jacob to Seaborn. It appears that Jacob and Lucy were one of the slave families that Seaborn and his brother, John Rozar Jr., owned over the next three decades [3].

At the end of chattel slavery in 1865, Jacob, Lucy, and Jonas either chose or court officials assigned them the surname "Rozier," an indication of their most recent owners during the slavery era. By the end of 1866, Jacob and Lucy, together with Jonas and Moses Rozier, had all moved across the county line into Houston County and settled near the county seat of Perry. Houston lay along the western side of Pulaski County, with Hawkinsville, the county seat of Pulaski, lying just a few miles east of the Houston County line. Along with them was Meady P. Rozar, the middle son of their former owner, John Rozar Jr.

Jacob Rozier and the other former slaves all settled on the farm of John Faulk, an exceedingly wealthy farmer who apparently split his time between his plantations in Houston County and those further north near Macon, in neighboring Bibb County [4]. On 18 January 1867, Jacob and Lucinda Rozier, together with Jonas, Moses, and several others, all described as a "freedmen," entered into a contract with Faulk in Houston County for the ensuing year. Faulk promised to supply the former slaves with "mules, land and working utensils, quarters and fuel." In exchange for their labor on his land, he also promised to give them one third of the "corn, cotton, peas and potatoes raised upon the place."

For their part, Jacob Rozier and the other freedmen agreed to cultivate all the land that Faulk "set apart for them to cultivate," and to grow the type of produce directed by him and "under his supervision and instructions, or that of his agent." They promised to "keep the fences in good repair," to perform other labor requested by Faulk, and to "be responsible for all damage done to Stock while in our possession." At the end of the growing season, they agreed "to gather the crop and deliver the cotton at the depot on the Macon & Brunswick Rail Road or in Macon." Rozier and the other freedmen also agreed:

...to conduct ourselves in an honorable, peaceable, and obedient manner towards said Faulk, his family or agent, and not allow his Stock or property of any kind to be injured or destroyed if in our power to prevent it. We further agree to pay the said Faulk for all demands he may have against us for provisions or other indebtedness. We further agree that if one, or any of us, fail to comply with the above contract, the one so failing Shall forfeit his, her, or their part of the crop. We also agree, that we or either of us voluntarily leave the plantation of said Faulk during working hours we forfeit two dollars ($2<sup>00</sup>) per day, or any fractional part thereof.

Jacob Rozier and the other freedmen made their marks to the document. To ensure that it was properly read to them, two witnesses certified that they heard the contract read to the freedmen and saw them make their marks to it. One of the witnesses was Meady Rozar, the third son of John Rozar Jr. Jacob and Lucy would have been well acquainted with Meady, knowing him from the time of his birth in the mid-1830s [5].

The Rozier freedmen left Houston County soon after fulfilling their 1867 contract. By about 1868, Jonas Rozier had moved back into Pulaski County, settling in the southwestern portion of the county near Hawkinsville. Jacob Rozier Sr. returned to the Rozar farms in what was then northeastern Pulaski. In 1869, both “Jacob Rozar Jr.” and “Jake Rozar Sr.” were listed as freedmen employed by Seaborn Rozar in Pulaski County, Georgia [6]. However, neither man was listed under Seaborn’s employment in 1870 [7]. Moreover, neither man has been located on the 1870 federal census in either Pulaski County or elsewhere.

There is no further known record of either Jacob Rozier Sr. or Lucinda Rozier. Since they were described as a “man” and a “woman” at Daniel Regan’s estate sale in 1827, their births probably occurred no later than 1805–1812. This would place them in their latter fifties or sixties by 1867. While they may have been omitted from the 1870 federal census, it also seems plausible that both died about 1870.

Without further records, it is impossible to compile an accurate list of the children of Jake and Lucy Rozier. However, the records imply that they had at least three children:

1. Angeline Rozier (c1825–aft. 1880) was listed as a child in Daniel Regan’s 1827 inventory. She appears to be the woman identified as “Angeline Reagan” in 1870 [8] and “Angeline Rosier” in 1880 [9] who lived with her children in the household with the family of Esau Rozier. The father of Angeline’s children is unknown
2. Esau Rozier (c1827–1880/1900).
3. Jacob Rozier Jr. (c1847–aft. 1880).

Jacob Rozier Jr.

According to his age on the 1880 federal census, Jacob Rozier Jr. was born about 1847 [1]. In 1869, both "Jacob Rozar Jr." and "Jake Rozar Sr." were listed as freedmen employed by Seaborn Rozar in Pulaski County, Georgia [2]. However, neither man was listed under Seaborn's employment in 1870 [3]. Moreover, neither man has been located on the 1870 federal census in either Pulaski County or elsewhere.

In 1872, Jacob Rozier was the only freedman by that surname assessed taxes in the Salem Militia District, charged for only one poll tax. Jinny Rozier, a sister of Jonas and de facto spouse of Seaborn Rozar, and their mixed-race sons were not listed on the 1872 tax digest. In 1873, Jacob Rozier was listed near Jinny and her three sons. Jacob was not listed in 1874, but in 1875, Jacob Rozier Jr. was again listed next to Jinny. Unlike Jinny and her sons, Jacob was not assessed taxes on any property, just his poll tax. In 1876, Jacob Rozier was still listed near Jinny and her sons, this time employed on the land of William W. Williford, an absent landowner. Jacob was also only assessed for his poll tax in 1876. In 1877, other freedmen cultivated Williford's lands, and Jacob Rozier was not assessed Pulaski County taxes [4].

After the 1876 harvest, Jacob Rozier moved north across the county line into the Shady Grove Militia District of Twiggs County. In 1877, he was assessed taxes as a freedman employed by Joseph K. Burnes, with his only property described as household and kitchen furniture valued at $10. In 1878, he was employed by James H. Ward and assessed taxes on one poll, livestock valued at $4, and household and kitchen furniture valued at $10. In 1880, he was still employed by Ward and assessed taxes only one poll and household and kitchen furniture valued at $10 [5].

The 1880 federal census enumeration of Twiggs County shows Jacob Rozier Jr. and his family living only a few households from Ward's. This record describes Jacob Rozier Jr. as a black male born about 1847, and his occupation was "Works on farm." He had married in the early 1870s to Rebecca, described as "mulatto," and they had three sons [6].

After the 1880 harvest, Jacob and Rebecca moved back across the county line into the Salem Militia District of Pulaski County. On the 1881 tax digest, Jacob Rozier was again listed near Jinny's sons and Moses Rozier, and he was only assessed taxes for one poll [7]. On 30 April 1881, "Jake" Rozier mortgaged property to secure his payment of two promissory notes both due October 1st and payable to McVay & Choate. One note was for $25, but the other was for an unspecified amount. When he signed the notes, Rozier was a resident of Pulaski County. Jake mortgaged the following property, which he attested was owned solely by him:

All my Crop for this year 1881, the same consisting of Seven acres in corn and Ten acres planted in Cotton, said Corn and Cotton is planted on land belonging to [blank] Rozier, said Crop is now up and is Cultivated by and for myself.

Jake made his mark to the mortgage [8].

After the 1881 harvest, Jake Rozier moved his family back across the county line into the Shady Grove Militia District of Twiggs County. In 1882 and 1883, he was again employed by J. H. Ward and assessed for one poll and a minimal amount of personal property [9]. Jacob Rozier is not found on any tax digests of either Pulaski or Twiggs County after 1883.

The last known record of Jacob Rozar Jr. was a decade later, when he obtained a license in Pulaski County, Georgia to marry Anna Trammell, with both of them identified as “Col<sup>d</sup>” [colored] by the court clerk. On 12 August 1893, the same day the court issued the license, minister F. Baker married the couple [10].

It is not known where Jacob Rozier lived between 1884 and 1893, nor what became of him after his 1893 marriage to Anna. He has not been located either in Georgia or elsewhere on any later census record.

We have no conclusive proof that Jacob Rozier Jr. was the son of Jacob Rozier Sr. and Lucinda Rozier, but given their employment in 1869 by Seaborn Rozar, this seems likely.

Notes

Roazar & Regan Family Background

1. The children of Reuben Rozar Sr. are not documented. Although circumstantial evidence suggests that Reuben is John's father, definitive claims of their father/son relationship found online today are merely speculative. Additionally, no known evidence proves that Mary's maiden name was Rozar, let alone that she was Reuben's daughter.

The deed stated that the Bools and Rozar were "All of the State of Georgia (Bools of Green [sic] County & Rozar of Jackson)." Rozar bought Lot #28 in District #24, originally in Wilkinson County, but then in Pulaski. Although the clerk recorded Rozar's residence as "Jackson" County, Georgia when he made the purchase, this is undoubtedly a clerical error. Tax records document Rozar's residence as Jefferson County, Georgia between 1796 and 1808.
